On Friday 27th of August I was invited to attend a trainers training course to run for four days, which had been organised by the Common Law Court.com. As I understood it by completing the four days I would be able to train other delegates to be Common Law (CL) Peace Constables. At the conclusion of these four days I understood that I would then also be signed off as a Common Law Court Peace Constable myself, as the training, undertaken by Mick Stott, covered both modules of train the trainer and peace constable course. I was assured that I would leave with full training skills, and that I would be signed off as a CL Peace Constable with a warrant card and a comprehensive manual to help with all I had learned on the course.

The training itself was delivered at a Peace Constables home in Cornwall. On Saturday (28th August) Mick informed all the trainees that he would not be there for the 3rd day (Sunday 29th August) as he had other business to attend to in Glastonbury. This was not received very well as most attendees, including myself, had taken time off from work to attend this four day course. We were told our training would resume and end on Monday (30th August) We discovered at a later date that Mick Stott delivered one day training in Glastonbury because he was getting paid; the four day course for Cornwall delegates was free. Mick was kindly given free separate accommodation for the duration of the course, by the two peace constables that let us use their home to train in.

On Monday we were told that a lady from Guardians 300, Donna Lee Andrews, would be coming along to discuss a few things with us all about how to move forward with Guardians 300. Which was very confusing as the course was organised by the Common Law Courts and we knew nothing about Guardians 300.

When Donna Lee Andrews arrived she explained that all training had to be done through the G300 website and that all courses would have to be paid for. We had previously been informed that all courses, warrant cards and uniforms would be free as we would be using our own time to train others; be called on to help others in need and keep the peace as and when we were needed if we were available.

Donna Lee went on to apologise for G300 sounding corporate but that's the way it had to be run. We were asked to download two applications, Lark and Arlo, and to only use those to communicate, book venues, and any other training, expenses, etc all had to go through G300 not the Common Law Court. I asked questions through the Lark app because I wanted to know after 4 weeks of waiting where our warrant cards, uniforms and manuals were. The reply I got from Donna Lee was "soon"

When Donna Lee was concluding her talk she asked to take an individual photo of us all, our dates of birth, our addresses, phone numbers, email addresses and bank details; acc number and sort code so G300 could pay future expenses for when we trained others to become Peace Constables. This amounted to £5 for lunch and £25 fuel regardless of where you were asked in the UK to train.

We soon discovered that the bank account name we were to use to pay monies into from venues that we booked for training, was in the name of Mick Stott, not G300. Mick endeavoured to reassure us that he wasn't gaining any monetary advantage by the account being in his name

Every single thing had to be done by G300 rules and only with their express consent or approval. This was not anything like the Common Law Court ethics and principals I've come to know and I'm extremely concerned that G300 holds personal data, including bank details, of twelve trusting delegates with good and honourable intent.

Nothing that was offered at the beginning of the course has been delivered to any of the delegates or myself, even though they took our addresses. Everyone from the course is deeply disturbed by all of this especially as G300 now has our personal data.
